Currículo

Federica Cagnoli is a Postdoctoral Researcher at CIES-ISCTE – Centre for Research and Studies in Sociology. She received her Ph.D. in Social Sciences from the University of Genoa. Her doctoral research focused on techno-scientific controversies, analysed through theories of expertise and public participation developed in Science and Technology Studies.
Her research expertise lies in science communication, public engagement with science and technology, public perceptions of science and risk, and the dynamics of expertise in socio-technical controversies.
She has worked at the European Commission Joint Research Centre and has contributed to Horizon Europe research projects. She has conducted research stays in Ireland and Germany and has published in peer-reviewed international journals on science communication, public perceptions of science, and socio-technical controversies. She has also presented her work at leading European and international conferences, including the European Association for the Study of Science and Technology (EASST) and the Public Communication of Science and Technology (PCST) network.
